Wm Lloyd Garrison and the Fight Against Slavery: Selections from the Liberator	Butler University		Published book

Description of Abolition, Anti-Slavery, and Underground Railroad Related Periodicals

Abolition Intelligencer and Missionary Magazine (1822-23): Stationed out of Shelbyville, Kentucky, this monthly magazine devoted the first half of its sixteen page editions to discourse regarding slavery, while the second half was dedicated to reports about Christian missions. The Abolition Intelligencer had a brief existence because of lacking funds from an under-populated state abolition society.

The Abolitionist (1833): This short-lived monthly was the record for the New England Anti-Slavery Society. Serving as president of this organization from 1843-1865 was famed abolition activist, William Lloyd Garrison.

The African Intelligencer (1820): One of the publications of the American Colonization Society (ACS), The African Intelligencer committed itself to issues of abolition, slavery and repatriation. The first and only issue of this journal held, amongst other pieces, a copy of the ACS constitution, articles about African geography, and a report of the journey of the Elizabeth, the first vessel to transport colonists to Liberia.

The African Observer (1827-28): A monthly journal meant to divulge the “general character, and moral and political effects of slavery”. Editor Enoch Lewis published these editions, which illustrated the history of the slave trade both early and contemporary, in order for society to see the truth about and to quash the institution.

The African Repository (1825-92): This monthly, published in Washington D.C., concerned itself with the issue of repatriation of Africans to their native land. It was another one of the publications of the American Colonization Society.

The African Repository and Colonial Journal: (See The African Repository)

The American Anti-Slavery Almanac (1836-47): A yearly publication that detailed the movement through the presentation of literature and art pertaining to the abolition cause. These compilations were distributed by the American Anti-Slavery Society, and edited, on occasion, by such renown authors as Lydia Maria Child.

American Anti-Slavery Reporter (1834): Founded in 1825 by Zachary Macaulay, the American Anti-Slavery Reporter advocated world-wide abolition of slavery. This periodical recounted abolitionist activities, detailed the evolution of abolition legislation in parliament, and offered the annual reports of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society (modernly known as Anti-Slavery).

American Jubilee (1854-55): This monthly newspaper took on slavery by contesting its constitutionality. Thus, discourse within this periodical revolved around popular political issues such as State’s Rights and the role of Federal Government.

The Anglo-African Magazine (1859-65): A monthly journal concerned with a wide variety of subject matter, ranging from Art and Poetry to Science and History. Included in this periodical’s literary repertoire is Martin Delaney’s novel Blake, which was printed in serial form.

The Anti-Slavery Examiner (1836-45): Focusing not only on anti-slavery rhetoric, this monthly digest took into consideration the right to contest the institution. The Examiner, a strong national voice, proposed that the majority of the nation condemned the act of slavery, and submitted to its readers scholarly proof that slavery was wrong.

Anti-Slavery Record (1835-37): This monthly publication sought to make the public aware of the horrors of slavery and of the physical and mental anguish suffered as a result. Articles detailed the punishments, escape attempts, and conditions in which slaves were kept, as recounted in slave narratives. The Anti-Slavery Record sought to impose rhetorical questions upon its reader, inciting pontification about the institution.

Anti-slavery Reporter (1833): A monthly periodical, the Reporter was stationed out of New York and was published by the American Anti-slavery Society. This publication can easily be confused with the British publication of the same sort, entitled Anti-Slavery Reporter, which was put out at a later date by the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.

Anti-Slavery Tracts (1855-61): The Tracts focused on legal, social, religious and intellectual arguments against slavery. This periodical, published by the American Anti-slavery Society, maintained that the Constitution, in its contemporary form, enabled slavery and perpetuated the brutalities of the system.

Cincinnati Weekly Herald and Philanthropist (1855-61): Considered the “first anti-slavery paper in the west”, this publication’s press was destroyed twice by angry mobs, but was repaired on both occasions. Despite these disruptions, this weekly was in print for 12 years.

Douglass' Monthly (1858-63): Edited by Frederick Douglass, this monthly newspaper advertised the evils of slavery in a sixteen page, three column format that was devoid of pictures and illustrations. What Douglass did include were the stories of strife and agony, with which he was familiar having been enslaved himself. Prior, this publication was known as the North Star and Frederick Douglass' Paper.

Emancipator (1820): Published in Jonesboro, Tennessee, the Emancipator's professed mission was to divulge “all the necessary information...of the progress of the abolition of slavery; together with a concise history of their [African descendants'] introduction into slavery”. This monthly paper, which cost $1 annually, also provided its readers with the proceedings of a number of anti-slavery organizations.

The Genius of Universal Emancipation (1821-39): Created by Quaker activist, Ben Lundy, the Genius was designed to fill the gaps the editor saw in other abolitionist papers. This periodical underwent a period (1829-30) of co-editing under William Lloyd Garrison. It was printed irregularly, and was published out of locations that include Mount Pleasant, Ohio; Greenville, Tennessee; Baltimore, Maryland; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Washington D.C.

Liberator (1831-1863): This four page weekly achieved great recognition by inciting heated contention from southern newspapers of the time. The Liberator was supported in large by the African American community and claimed “Our Country is the World – Our Countrymen are All Mankind”.

The Liberty Almanac: Unknown

The Monthly Offering (1840-42): One of a number of periodicals out of Boston, The Monthly Offering, presented its readers with poetry and music in addition to addressing the issues of abolition and slavery.

National Anti-Slavery Bazaar: Often gazettes and broadsides were sold at a fair entitled the National Anti-Slavery Bazaar. These publications featured articles and essays regarding the anti-slavery movement. They were put out by the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society, who spearheaded fundraising by conducting these fairs. Resulting publications included the National Anti-Slavery Standard.

National Era (1847-1860): This weekly publication was not solely focused upon the slavery issue, but rather dedicated to the dissemination of literary ideas and the conveyance of contemporary history. Overall, the National Era offered a variety of writings, from entertaining pieces to political and social commentaries.

National Principia (1859-66): In 1859, clergy appalled by the institution of slavery gathered in Worcester, Massachusetts to form the Church Antislavery Society. Their ideas were to be disseminated through the printing of the National Principia. Using the Bible as the basis of argument, these men of the cloth professed slavery to be contrary to God's law and thus, to be a sin. This paper was subtitled, "First Principles in Religion, Morals, Government, and the Economy of Life", and extended its scope to include Reconstruction, Temperance, and the events of the Civil War.

The Non-slaveholder (1846-1854): As alluded to by the name, this publication was concerned with educating the public on how to break the chain of events perpetuating slavery. Their motto, "Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own", branded everyone from the consumer of slave-made products to the slave-owner as conspirators in the oppression of those enslaved.

Protectionist (1841): Published by the Executive Committee of the State Anti-Slavery Society, this biweekly is of certain interest to scholars of abolition in the Hoosier state, as it was centered out of New Garden, Indiana.

The Provincial Freeman and Weekly Advertiser (1854-57): Claiming devotion to "Anti-Slavery, Temperance, and General Literature", the Provincial Freeman was a Canadian paper that sought to address the interests of people of color in both Canada and the United States.

Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine (1835-37): This quarterly publication, out of New York City, was one of many efforts from the American Anti-slavery Society.

Radical Abolitionist (1855-58): In 1885, a convention designating themselves the "Radical Political Abolitionists" convened, proclaiming slavery to be unjust and unconscionable. The Regenerator (1845-52): Headed up by O.S. Murray, a follower of Garrison and Owen and a community leader in Fruit Hills, Ohio, this paper represented itself as, "A free paper for the promotion of universal inquiry and progressive improvement".

Slavery in America (1836-37): Through this monthly periodical, British abolitionists were kept abreast of developments in their transatlantic efforts to end slavery in the United States. Headed up by Reverend Thomas Price, Slavery in America reported the goings-on of conferences, speeches and various writings to a predominantly British, Christian readership that was concerned with the abolition of slavery on a worldwide scale.

The Slave's Friend (1836-39): Published in New York, The Slave's Friend addressed the issue of slavery and abolition to a broad array of ages. Illustrations and stories of the horrors of the slave trade lined the pages, adjacent to children's songs about abolition and encouragement for the nation's youth to collect money to help in the anti-slavery cause.
